The United States has the fastest growing prison population in the Western World. One million US citizens are in prison with an additional 700,000 people under the control of the criminal justice system.

Women comprise the fastest growing population of people going to prison. The number of women prisoners has doubled during the last ten years. Eighty percent of incarcerated women are mothers — devastating to the social fabric of the United States.

Alejandrina Torres, in prison since 1983, is one of the 15 Puerto Rican pows. She is serving the equivalent of life in prison for “seditious conspiracy” to end US colonial domination of Puerto Rico. She was an activist and a community leader in Chicago. Alejandrina was a founding member and teacher at the Puerto Rican High School, one of the founders of the Betances Clinic and secretary of the First Congregational Church of Chicago.

Susan Rosenberg, a white North American anti-imperialist, is serving 58 years for possession of weapons and explosives; the longest sentence ever received for a possession offense. She has been a political activist all her adult life, committed to solidarity with the Puerto Rican Independence Movement and the Black Liberation Struggle. A doctor of acupuncture, prior to her incarceration she worked at a community health center in Harlem, New York, using acupuncture to fight the drug plague. She is a published poet, writer and an AIDS activist in prison.

We cannot forget these sisters. We cannot let the US government continue to lock them away, far from their communities.

In 1979, after an international campaign, President Jimmy Carter granted amnesty to four long-held Puerto Rican nationalist prisoners—among them, Lolita Lebron. All over the world governments have released political prisoners after many years. It is time for the US to do the same.

WOMEN POLITICAL PRISONERS in the UNITED STATES

There are over 150 political prisoners and prisoners of war (pows) held in US prisons. The United States government vehemently denies the existence of political prisoners and insists these women and men are criminals. The strategy of the US is to criminalize these political activists—to disguise their political identities behind the rhetoric of “terrorism” and criminal activity. They have been convicted of and imprisoned for activities which are political in nature. Their activities include fighting for human rights and self determination, Black liberation, sovereignty for Native American people, opposing US intervention and for Puerto Rican independence.

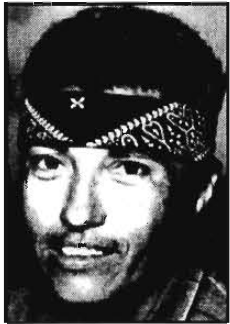

Linda Evans

Armed resistance in the Americas is not new, but part of a history which these political prisoners and pows personify. In fact, under international law, as well as the US constitution, people have a right and an obligation to resist the illegal policies and practices of their government.

Twenty-five percent of US political prisoners are women. They're Puerto Rican independentistas like Dylcia Pagan and Carmen Valentin, who received 55 and 98 years for “seditious conspiracy.” Or Norma Jean Croy, a Native American woman, who remains in prison after 17 years for a crime she didn't commit. And they're white North American anti-imperialists; Marilyn Buck, serving 80 years, for political actions with the Black Liberation Army, including the escape of Assata Shakur; or Linda Evans, serving 40 years for illegal purchase of weapons and “conspiracy to influence, change and protest policies and practices of the US government ...”

These women are the sisters of the Irish women who were locked down in the infamous Armagh or imprisoned in El Salvador. They are the sisters of women like Adora Fe DeVera, held for many years in underground prisons in the Philippines, or recently released prisoner, Irmgard Mueller, of Germany. Their fight is that of the Palestinians held in Israeli jails or locked down in the dungeons of Korea.

Norma Jean Croy

Worldwide, few governments recognize any of these women as political prisoners. The situation in the US is particular because US-held political prisoners have the longest sentences of any political prisoners in this hemisphere—longer than most political prisoners anywhere! Most are serving more than 50 years for crimes in which no one was hurt.

Like their international sisters, these women are committed political activists who continue to work from within the prison walls. They're spirits remain strong and unbroken despite continued sexual harassment, abuse and medical neglect.

The legacy of women's determination inspires and compels us to realize our aspirations ... We cannot demand rights for which we are not willing to struggle.

Alejandrina Torres

Alejandrina Torres, Puerto Rican independentista, along with US anti-imperialists, Susan Rosenberg and Silvia Baraldini, withstood years of sensory deprivation and small group isolation in the underground high security unit for women at the Federal Correctional Institute (FCI) at Lexington, Kentucky. A massive campaign finally forced the unit to close.
